Visits and conferences where appropriate

Independent Study Time:

It is important that History students at A level develop a broad knowledge of the context of the modules they are studying, for example the module including Churchill will require a sound understanding of not just his life but also the times he lived in and the key events of the period. This means students must read around the subject in their independent study time. This can include reading relevant articles in 'History Review', browsing the internet, collecting newspaper articles and discussion at home. A good understanding can be gained through watching T.V. programmes or films and reading novels or biographies about the periods you will study.

Homework will be set regularly and will include practice examination questions. These will be used to assess progress.

Progression and the Future:

An A level in History is regarded as an excellent measure of academic ability and is widely respected by employers. The subject gives students the means to develop their personal confidence by expressing views and opinions, the skills of reasoning, analysis and debate and the opportunity to develop literacy skills. It is a subject which compliments all other subject areas that students study at A level very well and is one of the key qualifications that professions, such as the law, journalism, teaching and administration would expect to see in their candidates.

Among the most successful people in the fields of business, politics, law and even entertainment have History qualifications and it is among the most popular subjects taken nationally at both A and degree level. As a result of the introduction of an English Baccalaureate at GCSE, it is expected that demand for History will increase.
